

STUDY 03

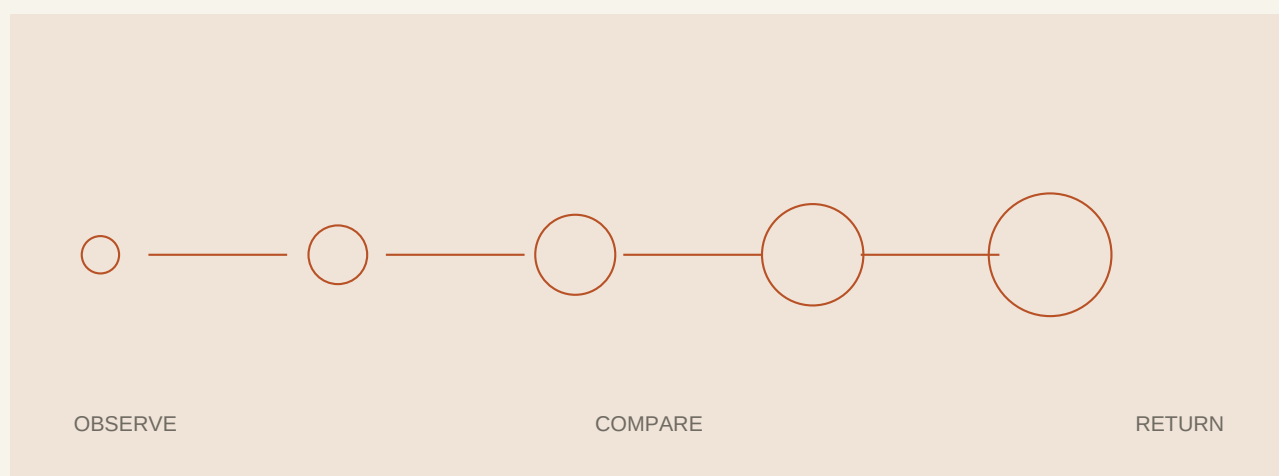

A Small Atlas of Attention

Three coordinates for noticing what a project asks us to see: duration, distance and recurrence.

01

Duration

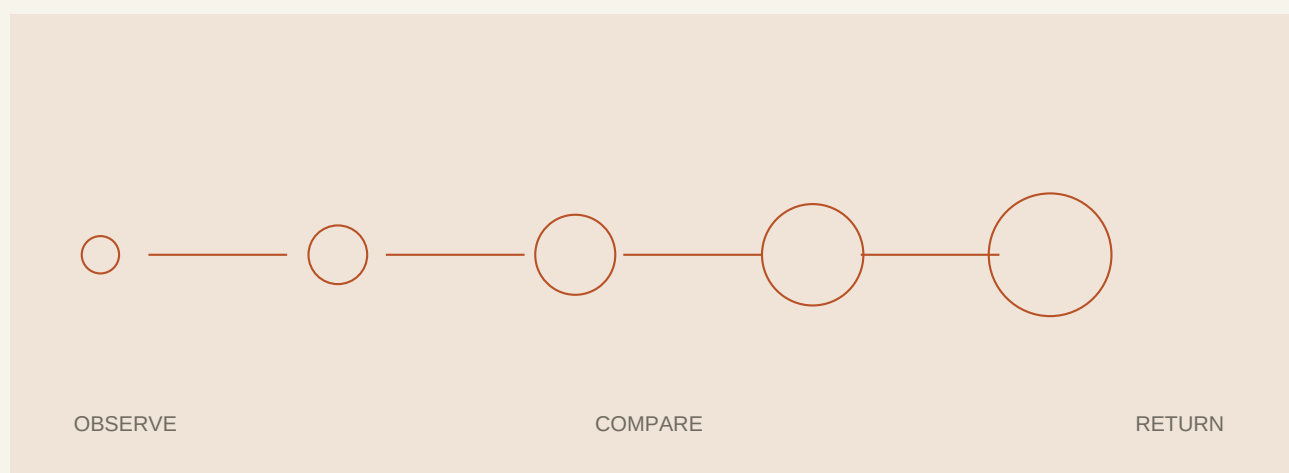

Some signals exist only because attention remains after novelty has gone. Duration separates a persistent structure from a momentary surprise. Return to the same material at different speeds and record what remains stable.

02

Distance

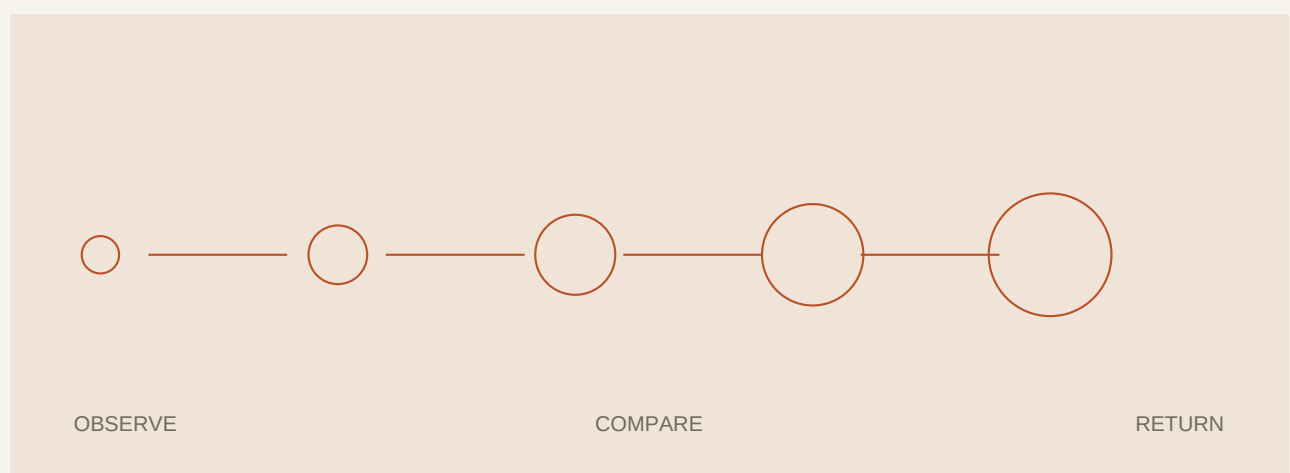

Every object changes with viewing distance. Close attention reveals texture and exception; distance reveals repetition and proportion. Neither view is authoritative by itself. The useful description states the distance from which it was made.

03

Recurrence

A detail that appears in unrelated places may be more than coincidence. Recurrence is a prompt to compare contexts, not an excuse to collapse them. Mark each appearance, preserve its local meaning, then ask what relationship can be supported.

An atlas does not replace the territory. It makes the return deliberate.
